Sample answer:
The war was greeted by Germany with elation and excitement. Young men rushed to enlist, whilst those already conscripted took great pride in their duty, as it was believed to be their patriotic duty to go to war and defend the ‘Fatherland’. As can be seen in Source C, which demonstrates Kaiser Wilhelm II speeding through the Western Front, Germany believed that the war would be over by Christmas, thus all rushed to become involved as they didn’t want to miss out on the action. However, as the stalemate ensued into 1915 and total war began to penetrate all aspects of German life, there was an increasing attitude of war-weariness.

The Allied Naval Blockade caused mass food shortages at the home front, worsened by the ‘turnip winter’ of 1916. This decreased productivity in Germany and hence the number of supplies reaching the soldiers diminished, decreasing morale at both the Western Front and the home fronts. Furthermore, the government’s increased war spending, as can be seen in Source D, further worsened the poverty and starvation at home.

This sparked frustration and anger on the home front, as well as the Western Front, and by 1916 over one million workers struck against the war. As the war pushed on, the German army began to suffer mass mutinies, particularly in the parts of Kiel and Wilhelmshaven. As can be seen, German attitudes to the war rapidly changed as the war pushed on.

</tbody>

Sample answer:

Source A is King George V’s message to the British Expeditionary Force on the 12 August 1914, reinforcing the soldiers that ‘Duty is [their] watchword’ and encouraging them before they go to battle. King George V was the British monarch and was in a high ranking position in British society. This message is also from not long after the onset of war. Therefore, King George’s perspective is very anti-German, proud and protective over his Empire, placing Britain in a positively moral light. ‘France is about to be invaded by the same powerful foe’ demonstrates how Germany is antagonised, making this a biased and subjective source, compromising its factual reliability. King George’s authority over Britain naturally leads to the perspective of one affirmed that their nation’s will is correct and their enemies will be defeated because goodness will triumph.

He is trying to encourage and justify the war to his soldiers. Therefore the opinionated and prejudiced nature of this source renders it quite factually unreliable, however these words are straight from the hand of the King, making it reliable if the historian would like to know the attitudes of the British authorities. Therefore, Source A is useful for a historian who wants to study attitudes of authorities towards the Western Front but if they are looking for a source demonstrating attitudes ‘towards a quick victory’ they will need to find other sources, as in Source A, it is implied in ‘I pray to God to … bring you back victorious’, but it is unclear and a historian needs to find sources that are more relevant to attitudes towards a quick victory on the Western Front, as well as cross checking this source and being aware that it contains anti-German bias. Source C, a German cartoon thought to be from 1915, depicts the German general driving into victory with an angel on his car and a sign that says ‘à Paris’. This perspective is strongly anti-French and has prejudice against the Allies; it may be a propaganda message intended to sway the German people into believing the power and nobility of their army, and the angel also conveys that their fight is morally justified. This biased perspective decreases the factual reliability – it is a very nationalistic, skewed view, however it is reliable if the historian wants a direct example of attitudes and propaganda messages of the time as it effectively conveys the nationalistic attitude.

For a historian studying the attitudes towards a quick victory this cartoon would be useful because it portrays the attitudes of the Germans, their eagerness to conquer Paris, and by depicting them as powerful and France in dark ruins in the background, it strongly implies the belief that German strength will quickly prevail. However, the historian needs to supplement this source with other like it to improve reliability (of attitude, not factual reliability) and obtain sources where the message and attitude for a quick victory is conveyed with more clarity.
