Start here.

The law is very effective in achieving justice for all parties involved in relationship breakdowns.

When the relationship breakdown starts the lawyer is contacted or a divorce is wanted, the couple is then sent to a lawyer to help them with the issue or wonder.

The first thing the lawyer does is asks what the situation is and if it can be resolved without going to court, the couple is then sent out to try and compromise and resolve it alone without the ~~lawyer~~ help.

If the couple fails to sort the problem out alone they return to the lawyer, the couple is then sentenced to live together and to try and repair the marriage for a period of 12 months this is done to assure that if they change their mind or anything happens it can benefit or effect the case or situation.

After the 12 months the couple return to the lawyer and are asked to report on their situation, if the situation is resolved then no further matters are to be taken, but if they still want to separate then the lawyer tries to help them divide their income and items, and also the child is set to decide who they want to live with, depending on the child's age the decision can be made by the child or ~~lawyer~~ court ^{the court then judges} if the home is suitable and the parent is suitable to take care of their kid.

After all the stuff has been divided and child custody has been decided the parents/couple have been given divorce papers to sign ^{after} the papers are the divorce is ~~then~~ finalised ~~and~~ then the couple is split up and allowed to go their separate ways.
