A range of factors that can impact on health and well-being are: lifestyle factors, lifestyle choices, communication, social, environmental factors and nutrition. Lifestyle factors and choices can impact on people's health and well-being by the way they live, for example if a person has to move into a nursing home their life would change which would affect their health and well-being. Communication factors and issues can impact on people's well-being and health by them not being able to hear or talk to others which would impact on their well-being as they could be frustrated, angry and upset that they can't communicate effectively with others. Social factors can impact on health and well-being of people as they wouldn't feel confident if they don't socialise with others but if they do socialise with others it would improve their health and well-being by making them happy, for example people can socialise through playing or talking to others. Environmental factors such as where they live, what is available to them and what they can access can impact on people's health and well-being by not being able to go to give them bad health and well-being.
