

Start here.

A relationship breakdown may involve divorce, or death. When a couple ~~is~~ <sup>gets</sup> married, they are able to sign an agreement <sup>which</sup> states that in case of a divorce, everything owned by either is to be shared equally amongst the 2. ~~They also~~ This includes money, properties, furniture/electronics, even kids. They are also able to agree that in case of a divorce, both people leave with their own things and money. These are two very flexible options once getting married. and in case of a divorce make it easier to split everything.

Thus I believe the effectiveness of the law in achieving justice for people involved in relationship breakdown, is very efficient. It creates ~~an~~ easier option when going through the breakdown itself can be a gruelling process.

If children are involved, there are options available where both parents may have partial custody over the children. In some cases one parent gets full custody and the other may get none at all. ~~3~~

When a relationship breakdown occurs, the main aim ~~of the~~ is to make life easier, (in some way) for all parties involved. It's not about giving everything to one and none to the other. It's about justice, and what's best for the individual.
