

Within the criminal justice system, there are many tensions between community interests and individual rights and freedoms. The disagreement of decisions and guidelines act as grounds for tension.

Community interests display a large variety of opinions, and are often not agreed with by the regulations of individual rights and freedoms. An example of this is displayed when communities join in protest against something, eg. war. Although protesting comes under the human rights act of freedom of speech, there are often fine lines between freedom of speech and the act of public disruption, as protests can turn violent and aggressive.

Upbringing the criminal justice system,

When regarding to cases in the criminal ~~court~~ and justice system, ~~but~~ hearings, trials are put in place to resolve tensions and work towards agreements and decisions.

This is ~~is~~ so that all individuals can be treated fairly and justly. Community interests can often tie in with individual rights and freedoms as their interests are in such the same as the laws of rights and freedoms. However, ~~the~~ community interest can also often be in disagreement and this is when tensions are risen. This is when the criminal justice system takes over and their laws and regulations determine the outcome of these tensions

Citizens often disagree with the outcomes of the law, and tensions are high.

An example of this for instance, is when a person commits a crime and their punishment or sentence seems to be unfair, whether it be a punishment seen as too much for the crime, or not punishment enough.
