The right to individual freedom is present in many states ~~throughout~~ ^{around} the world however it is still not universally recognised. Breaches of freedom can be seen through crimes such as human ^{trafficking} ~~trafficking~~ and slavery. As the world progresses in its understanding of humanity and equality, these sorts of crimes have ~~been~~ ^{been} more widely recognised and actions have been put in place to eradicate them or reduce their ~~effect~~ ^{impact} on victims - as seen through the early US led policy of abolitionism. In today's society organisations such as the United Nations places strong emphasis on the rights of individuals including their right to individual freedom. Because of this, this right has been included within the structure of the UN Charter of Rights and may be punished on an international level such as through the International Criminal Court.
